Abstract

Introduction: The efforts towards elimination of malaria in Nigeria is being anchored based on a policy document - the National Antimalarial Treatment Policy (NATP). This study is to assess awareness of the NATP and the level of practice of malaria self-care among medical students and the University staffs working in the Medical college/Teaching hospital. Material and Method: A descriptive study that took place at the University of Calabar Teaching Hospital, Calabar involving medical students and members of the staff of the University working in the laboratories. Information was obtained from the participants through administration of structured questionnaire. Results: One hundred and thirty two (65%) were aware of the existence of national antimalarial treatment policy. One hundred and fifty two (73%) of the participants practiced malaria self-care. The association between gender and awareness of antimalarial treatment policy was statistically significant (p-value = 0.020; $X^2 = 5.46$). The odds of being aware of antimalarial treatment policy was increased by a factor of 1.873 being a male rather than being a female (p-value = 0.61). Participants of younger age (age group 17–25) were more likely to visit Chemist shop to purchase antimalarial drug for self-medication than older participants. Conclusion: The level of awareness of the national antimalarial treatment policy was considerably high among the participants with an attendant high level of malaria self-care practices. There is room to improve on the level of awareness and to dissuade young people from practicing self-medication

BACKGROUND

Malaria has remained a major public health menace in Nigeria. The health and economic impact of malaria in Nigeria is huge. In Nigeria, malaria is endemic and the transmission of malaria occurs all year-round. The entire Nigerian population of about 190 886 313 is at risk of malaria – the 25% of global burden of malaria is contributed by Nigeria [1]. Thirty percent of childhood mortality and 11% of maternal mortality is reported to result from malaria, in effect, significantly contributing to the loss of one million lives globally, most of whom being children and pregnant women [2].

In 2005, Nigeria came up with a major update of the national antimalarial drug policy. The policy change was in line with the World Health Organization's (WHO) recommendation of the use of artemisinin-based combination therapies (ACT) in countries where P. falciparum malaria is resistant to chloroquine, sulfadoxine-pyrimethamine and amodiaquine [3]. Nigerian Federal ministry of Health (FMOH) in 2005 adopted the antimalarial drug treatment policy (NATP) and the national antimalarial treatment guideline (NATG) in conjunction with the National Malaria and Vector Control Division [4, 5]. The overarching aims of both NATP and NATG are to reduce morbidity, reduce malaria morbidity by halting the progression of uncomplicated disease into severe and potentially fatal disease, introduce effective intermittent preventive treatment and reduce the development of antimalarial drug resistance. The WHO has been in the vanguard of directing and streamlining the development of antimalarial treatment guidelines based on the latest best available evidences in malaria research. The core principles guiding the development of WHO Guidelines for the treatment of malaria include: early diagnosis and prompt, effective treatment of malaria, rational use of antimalarial agents, combination therapy, and appropriate weight-based
